Sustainability key to growth in Africa

TUESDAY 11 MAY 2010 / PRESS RELEASE

Africa is the most mineral rich continent on earth and open for business in a big way, this has not gone unnoticed by the industry's executives who have announced their meeting at the latest IAG Mining Africa summit.

The continent's mining industry is continually expanding and adapting to changing conditions with more international companies scrambling for a piece of the continent's resources. But it is now the time to start considering the environmental impact.

For good reason, the mining sector has come under more scrutiny globally than any other in the past two decades. Whereas mining has attracted considerable foreign direct investment into Africa, has generated auxiliary infrastructure, and boosted export earnings, it's environmental, developmental and governance records have been highly uneven, ranging from the exemplary to the corrupt, unscrupulous and destructive.

Yet the mining sector has and continues to reform itself in significant respects and a new genre of mining operation is evident in Africa. Its role is to not just be a good Corporate Citizen but also a potential driver of local, regional and national development.

New age mining in Africa is not only possible, it is essential for long term sustainable growth.
